

With all due respect, I think you and Steve are missing my point. I disagree with Abby on many things. This post mentioned nothing about agreeing with Abby. I simply said this movie is causing a conversation to be front and center that is rarely front and center in our culture, and critical Christians are missing this opportunity and are instead straining at gnats. You know very well that I am familiar with the arguments and intricacies of the issues/methodology/controversies concerning this movie. Why mention them, when the viewers know nothing about them? Why point them out? Why focus on that when there is an opportunity to point people to sidewalk ministry...Something very few Christians know anything about? Who cares if Abby makes some money off this? Who cares what Abby has said in the past (that no one watching the movie knows anything about)? Just focus like a laser on raising up more sidewalk counselors, more laborers. This kind of strife looks very unbecoming on our brothers and sisters.

And Chris, no one is “riding the Abby Johnson train” and no one is “jumping ship” because they point out that this movie is a great opportunity to raise up more laborers. This kind of exaggerated rhetoric only proves my point. Re-read my post please.